

Enter the business world of food and natural resources

Agricultural Economics and Business graduates learn how agribusinesses operate within the global food and fiber markets that influence decisions all the way from which crops and livestock are produced to how consumers needs are ultimately met.

Graduates embark on a variety of careers:

- Business Management – From companies in the expanding landscape design and maintenance industry to farm-input supply businesses, from commodity processors to retail grocers, and many other places in the business world
- Marketing and Customer Relations – From manufacturers of production inputs such as chemicals or machinery to large food processors, from commodity organizations to public relations firms
- Finance, Insurance and Real Estate – From private financial institutions to government agencies that serve agriculture and rural communities
- Agricultural Equipment Systems Management – From machinery manufacturers to local dealerships, from the forest products industry to nursery production and landscape maintenance
- Graduate and Professional School – Alumni are also well-prepared for various graduate programs – from law to economics, from business to Extension education

- Natural Resource Management – From local governments to consulting firms, from state conservation agencies to non-profit organizations
